Inferring formation mechanism of bacterial biofilms by comparing metabolic capabilities. Understanding the formation mechanisms of bacterial biofilms is vital to control their growth in the environment and to treat the associated diseases. Therefore, it is important to identify the key bacterial biofilm formation mechanisms. In this study, a metabolic model of the biofilm of the Gram-negative bacterium Pseudomonas aeruginosa was formulated to identify important biological phenomena. The model was developed by integrating the metabolic reactions and their stoichiometries into a biofilm formation mechanism. It also serves as a basis for simulating and analyzing diverse biofilm patterns. The proposed model shows that the growth rate of the biofilm can be accelerated by increasing the glucose uptake and the diversity of substances taken up. The results show that the presented model can be used to predict the influence of environmental conditions on the biofilm formation process. Thus, the present study demonstrates that the proposed model provides a potential approach for describing the formation mechanism of biofilms.
